

On the Brink - Fairshare Analysis

Funding contributed by G7 members states to UN appeals for Nigeria, Yemen, South Sudan, and Somalia

According to data from the UN's Financial Tracking System (the only official system for tracking donor funding) and information Oxfam received from G7 members: no G7 country has provided their fair share of funding for all four nations facing famine.

(Note that the FTS website may not have been updated with recent pledges.)

According to UN figures, as of May 18, only 30 percent of the $6.3 billion needed has been received. Country by country, this means that Nigeria is only 21 percent funded; Somalia, 33 percent; South Sudan, 42 percent; and Yemen, 21 percent.

In total the fairshare for G7 countries would be $2.9billion so far they have contributed $1.7billion

G7 leaders must commit to fund each country based on their fair share, while pressing other donors to do their part, in order to prevent more people from dying of hunger. These contributions alone would mean $492 million for Nigeria, $703 million for Somalia, $764 million for South Sudan, and $964 million for Yemen.

G7 must also commit to upscale ODA for longer term solutions that build resilience and improve food security and nutrition, in order to prevent further crises from escalating into disasters.

Only one G7 leader (UK) has provided its fair share for Yemen, two (UK and Canada) for South Sudan, two (UK and Germany) for Somalia and two (Canada and Germany) for Nigeria.

The United States Congress commitment of $990m to address famine in the four countries is welcomed, but this must be urgently translated into aid on the ground if the impact of famines is to be reduced.

*In addition to direct contributions, imputed share of ECHO and CERF commitments are attributed where relevant. This was calculated using the publically available figures of contributions per member state.
